Encouraged by Mrs. Ward , Mrs. Yeargin taught honor students in the state " teacher cadet " program , a reform creation designed to encourage good students to consider teaching as a career .

She won grant money for the school , advised cheerleaders , ran the pep club , proposed and taught a new " Cultural Literacy " class in Western Civilization and was chosen by the school PTA as " Teacher of the Year " .

" She was an inspirational lady ; she had it all together , " says Laura Dobson , a freshman at the University of South Carolina who had Mrs. Yeargin in the teacher-cadet class last year .

She says that because of Mrs. Yeargin she gave up ambitions in architecture and is studying to become a teacher .

Mary Beth Marchand , a Greenville 11th grader , also says Mrs. Yeargin inspired her to go into education .

" She taught us more in Western Civilization than I 've ever learned in other classes , " says Kelli Green , a Greenville senior .

In the classroom , students say , Mrs. Yeargin distinguished herself by varying teaching approaches - forcing kids to pair up to complete classroom work or using college-bowl type competitions .

" She just never gave it up , " says Mary Marchand , Mary Beth 's mother .

" You 'd see her correcting homework in the stands at a football game . "

Some fellow teachers , however , viewed Mrs. Yeargin as cocky and too yielding to students .

Mrs. Ward says she often defended her to colleagues who called her a grandstander .

Pressures began to build .
