Rodrigo Miranda, a local lawyer and human-rights monitor, recalls an intoxicated Noriega visiting prisoners in their cells at the 5th Zone Garrison headquarters in David, where he had his offices.

[22013068]

"People started wondering if something was wrong with him," Mr. Miranda recalls.

[22013069]

But through this period, so far as the U.S. military was concerned, Mr. Noriega was a model recruit.

[22013070]

He signed up for intelligence and counter-intelligence training under American officers at Fort Gulick in Panama in July 1967, according to a copy of a 1983 resume with details Mr. Noriega has since classified as secret.

[22013071]

He flew to Fort Bragg, N.C., in September of that year for a course in psychological operations, returning to the School of the Americas in Panama for a two-month course called "military intelligence for officers."

[22013072]

Some American officers interpreted his eagerness and studiousness as a sign of loyalty, but they did so falsely.

[22013074]

He became Gen. Torrijos' inseparable shadow, and the holder of all Panama's secrets.

[22013076]

When U.S. diplomats complained to the CIA of Col. Noriega's moonlighting, intelligence experts always insisted that his allegiance was first to the Americans.

[22013078]

"Some of us wondered how our intelligence people could put so much stock in his information when he was just as close to the Cubans."

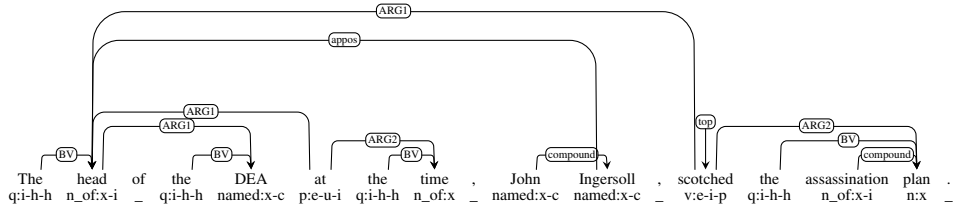

[22013079]

Even at this early stage, drugs caused additional concerns.

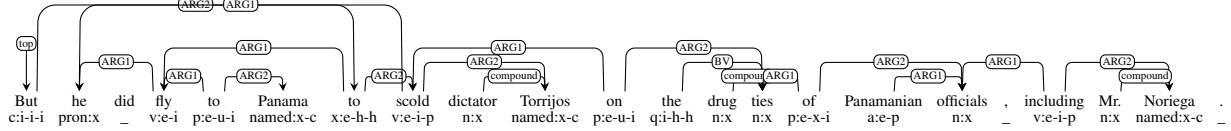

[22013080]

During the Nixon administration, the Drug Enforcement Administration became dismayed at the extent of the G-2's connections to arrested drug traffickers.

Mr. Blandon says the general allowed the Contras to set up a secret training center in Panama.

[22013127]

Mr. Noriega also conveyed intelligence from his spy operation inside the Nicaraguan capital of Managua.

[22013128]

And on at least one occasion, in the spring of 1985, he helped arrange a sabotage attack on a Sandinista arsenal in Nicaragua.

[22013129]

Although his help for the Contra cause was limited, it was enough to win him important protectors in the Reagan administration. Says Sen. Patrick Leahy, a Vermont Democrat who then served on the Senate Intelligence Committee.

[22013130]

"Noriega played U.S. intelligence agencies and the U.S. government like a violin," he says.

[22013131]

An incident in 1984 suggested one additional means by which Mr. Noriega might have maintained such influence with Washington by compromising U.S. officials.

[22013132]

Curtin Windsor, then the ambassador to Costa Rica, recalls being invited to Panama by Mr. Noriega's brother Luis Carlos for a weekend of deep sea fishing and "quiet, serious conversation" on the Aswara Peninsula.

[22013133]

Mr. Windsor notified Everett E. Briggs, the U.S. ambassador to Panama, of the invitation.

[22013134]

"Briggs screamed," Mr. Windsor recalls.

[22013135]

He says Mr. Briggs told him he was being set up for a "honey trap" in which Mr. Noriega would try to involve him in an orgy and then record the event "with sound and video."

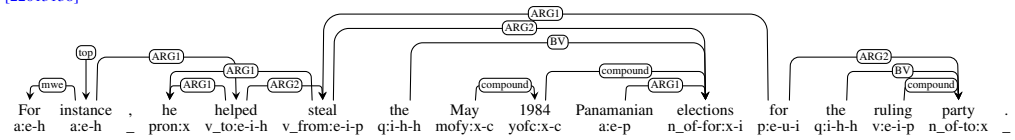

[22013136]

Mr. Briggs, on vacation after resigning his position at the National Security Council, could not be reached for comment.

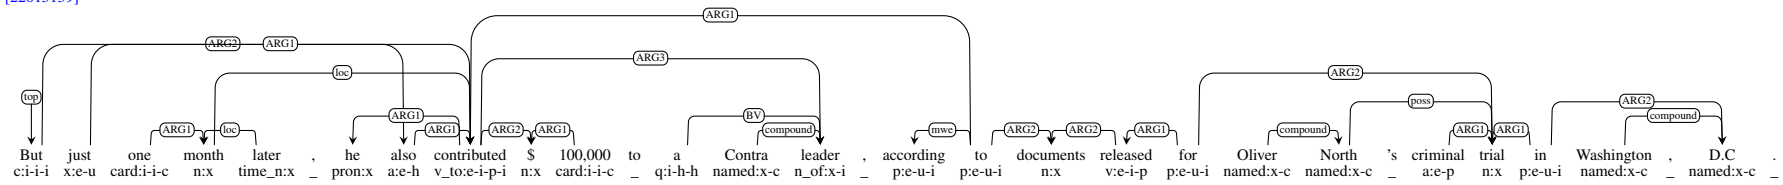

[22013137]

As Mr. Noriega's political troubles grew, so did his offers of assistance to the Contras, an apparent attempt to curry more favor in Washington.

During negotiations with American officials in May 1988 over proposals to drop the U.S. indictments in exchange for his resignation, Mr. Noriega often asked almost plaintively how the Americans, whom he had helped for so many years, could turn against him.
